The role of a family and school in the development of patriotism and citizenship values in the children

Abstract:

This study seeks to identify the concept of patriotism and citizenship and the difference between them. It is an attempt to identify the role played by the family and the school as the most important two institutions in the community represented in the upbringing of children on patriotism and citizenship values. The researcher used the descriptive method in the study of the role required from the family and the school in the development of values of patriotism and citizenship in the hearts of children. The findings show the status of the family and the school in the educational process and the importance of the role played by the family and the school in the development of patriotism and citizenship in children. All these have been emphasized by the researcher in the results and recommendations.

Introduction:

Nowadays the patriotism and citizenship have become very important, in order to save the identity of each community in the light of what threatens it by the dangers of globalization, and its institutions. This does not mean that the solution lies in retreat on the self, and to get away from the world, which has become a small village. In fact, it means getting immunity for each individual through educating him patriotism that focuses on providing knowledge, values, principles and skills which enable him to interact with the contemporary world without affecting the national character.

The education on the values of citizenship may be one of the most effective means of building the balanced character, a citizen who loves the country and is dedicated in its development. Moreover, he or she is also aware of his moral, national, cultural, humanitarian roles. He initiates to practice this role in the actions, reaction and behavior, because education in its most delicate content is the key of national security (Faraj, 2004,p. 35).

On the basis of faith in the importance of preparing a good citizen before any professional or academic preparation, under the current circumstances that include major challenges that try to deform the cultural, national and religious identity directly and indirectly. It was necessary to focus on the development of the values of citizenship, promote and put it in its right place as one of the educational priorities in all educational institutions, both formal and non-formal (Mujaydil, 2001,p. 17).

The childhood is one of the most important stages for instilling the concepts, knowledge and values particularly those related to homeland and national citizenship. Instilling such values during childhood make it a component in the construction of his character. A child has to be taught that he is living in a society and he is a member of it and he has to be a good citizen, able to hold the responsibility and participation in society progress. A child has to be created in a way he is loyal and patriotic to his homeland.

The researcher has found through review of the previous studies such as (Al-Sabih, 2005) and the two studies of (Ma'amari, 2009, 2010) and a study of (Hamdan, 2009) and other studies that all have focused and emphasized the importance and the need to instill values of patriotism and citizenship values for the students in general, during their formative years and their levels of study. Despite an agreement of this research with the previous research and studies in educational institutions which insert the values of patriotism and citizenship values, it is different in that it focuses on the most two important institutions in this are -family and school - with its focus on an important part of society (children). It combines the values of patriotism and citizenship.

Research objectives:

This research aims to achieve the following objectives:

1-To state the meaning of patriotism and values of citizenship and the difference between them.

2 - To identify the role of the family in the development of patriotism and citizenship in the life of children.

3 - To identify the role of the school in the development of patriotism and citizenship in the life of children.

The importance of research :

The importance of this research is as follows :

1 - It arises from the importance of patriotism and citizenship values, the importance of development of the citizen and developing his/her positive behaviors since childhood through instilling positive concepts and values - especially values of patriotism and citizenship.

2 –It may be clear the importance of this research comes from the importance of age as the phase focuses on childhood. At this stage the child should be prepared to understand and gain everything related to homeland.

3 - This research may contribute to science which may be useful in raising children on the patriotism and citizenship, and the rooting of these concepts as a requirement in the confrontation of social changes of the time and taking care of instilling right patriotism.

Research Methodology :

The researcher has used the philosophical analysis in order to stand on the concept of the patriotism and citizenship. He also follows the descriptive approach in the study of the role required by the family and school in the development of patriotism and citizenship in the hearts of children.

First: the definition of patriotism and citizenship and the difference between them.

Patriotism definition:

Patriotism is defined as: a proper expression that means individual's love and devotion to his homeland which includes belonging to the land, the people, customs, traditions and history. It is a dedication to the service of the nation. This term suggests autism with the nation (Alhabeeb, 2005, p.14).

It is also known as: the collective feeling that connects between the sons of the group and fills their hearts with love of the homeland and the community, and a willingness to exert maximum effort in order to build it and the readiness to die in defense of them.

Citizenship definition:

The Global Arabic encyclopedia (1996 p 311) defines citizenship as the term that refers to belonging to a nation or country. It is defined as the relationship between the individual and the state, as determined by the law of that State, including the reciprocal relationship from the duties and rights - in that state. The relationship shows implication of freedom and the responsibilities that accompanies it (Alkuwari, 2001, p. 66).

Accordingly, citizenship's prestige is enjoyed by someone as a complete member in a particular community. This total membership refers to reciprocal obligations on the part of individuals and the state. The individual has the rights guaranteed by the constitution and laws emanating from it as a result of belonging to this community. And at the same time, he has to perform the duties obliged by the constitution and laws emanating from it.

The difference between the two:

Patriotism and citizenship are still questionable and a field of study. It is self-evident that patriotism is feeling while citizenship is practice. Patriotism is love and loyalty but citizenship is to accept willingly or restlessly. Patriotism is passion and emotional excitement while citizenship is behavior and actions. Patriotism is a performance that takes place in pubic occasions while citizenship is individual performance of daily duties. This means patriotism is as a result of the reality while citizenship is a way to the goal. It is also agreed that the patriotism is the outcome of citizenship. There is no good patriotism, without good citizenship. But citizenship can be done without patriotism. Patriotism is related to history and identity while the citizenship is the harmony and the daily rhythm of life.

First: Family,

Many studies have noted that young people who live in fragmented, flimsy and shaky families suffer from emotional problems and social development, unlike those who live together in normal families, based on love, affection, mutual respect, security, tranquility and stability (Qzam, 1989, p. 52).

In the family a child receives first lesson about the right and duty, right and wrong, and good and bad, the wanted and unwanted desire, what may and what may not be, what he or she should do and what and why he/she must avoid and, how has the complacence of group and how to avoid its anger and outrage at him. Family is the one that grants the child the social conditions and identifies him from the outset trends in behavior and choices (Diab, 1980, p. 344).

The family is the most important element of the social nurture in general and the nurture in the values of citizenship, in particular. This can be attributed to several reasons: permanent link and early or direct influence on child, where the interaction between the child and the family is more intense and longer. The pre-school periods are considered the most important periods in shaping the child's personality and define the parameters of future values and social behavior, which of course affects the values of citizenship (Ismail, 1986, p. 269).

If the family works to continue physical community providing it with the new members through reproduction, and keeping its organic being, it also continue moral support for this community and strikes root its values, standards of behavior, trends, the revenues, methods for the children of this community, and this reserves its cultural entity (Osman, 1986, p. 62).

Hence, without any doubt the family is the basis of pre-existing material of the individual. It is also the basis of moral preparation for him. This confirms that the greater family ties and communication among family members, the greater the influence of the family in building and instilling the values of citizenship to their children. This leads the child to his parents' satisfaction by accepting the values they believe in, and be what they want.

Some researchers have linked the emergence of the other persona and between certain conditions of family upbringing. The character that depends on the others as determined by their researches is the result of a specific branch of upbringing. Her style is organized on traditional themes in mostly and social acceptance (Hussain, 1981, p. 71).

The family has a big role in the development of the values of citizenship, and this depends on the methods of family education and the relationship of fathers and sons and the space available within the family environment for Democratic Dialogue about different issues. The family has the role in developing the capacity of children to criticism and sentencing. In addition to the language spoken by parents about community issues and achievements (Mkrom, 2004, p. 371).

In consequence the researcher can confirm that the nature of the interactions and dynamics is the one that interacts within the family. It is an influential factor in giving children specific values. The center of the family and its social and economic size has an impact to the same degree and perhaps more (Zaher, 1986: 67).

The little boy pays a lot of attention to the actions of his parents, brothers and the rest of his family and that makes him or her imbue the values that underlie these behaviors and expression as well as the child formulates his or her behavior and relations with the parents and family (Bakar, 2003, p. 29-30), and this confirms the importance of the first six years of a child's life in shaping his future, which are often spent with his family. This creates in child emotions of loyalty to the homeland through his sense of loyalty to the family. The child takes his outlook on life from home whether they are optimistic or pessimistic. Joslin Peter says: the parents for their children are the greatest and most important source of values (Mkrom, 1987, p. 208).

When authoritarian values prevail in family, they weaken the confidence of one's self, and underestimate his independence, and that leads for depending on others, and bows to any authority stronger or older than him. The spirit of humiliation, wretchedness, and submission to the head escalates with him. The slogan of person becomes "I first obeyed and last refuse" means he or she obeys, is the first to obey orders and the last to opposes as he has no opinion (Zaher, 1986, p. 42).

According to the foregoing discussion the researcher finds that the influential role and the significant role of the family in raising awareness of the values of citizenship and patriotism and exercising them depends on the factors that affect the family itself. The educational level of the parents, family income and standard of living, and the neighborhood in which they live, contact of the family with school to track awareness, practice of the values of citizenship, and the type of the relationship between the family members, and other factors with a significant impact in promoting the awareness and practice of the values of citizenship in the event of a positive those factors, or for the decline and fall of this effect in the event of a negative of those factors, but may occur adverse impact in the demolition of the values of citizenship and shun her.

Third: School,

The school cannot be neutral towards the social responsibility, because its developments of values are an integral part of its responsibility towards the community in general, and students who participate in special composition (Othman, 1986, p.66).

John Dewey (1966, p.31) says: "The school cannot be prepared for the social life unless it provides from within the same similar conditions of social life,". This means that the student is aware of the values of citizenship and practicing them in the school, before moving to exercise them in the scope of his large community. The school in many of its conditions is a microcosm of society. If a school is in a secular society, it should prepare students for citizenship in a secular society, and if they are in an Islamic society, it should prepare students for citizenship in a Muslim society, and so on with the rest of the communities (Mkrom, 2005, p. 232).

The main social function of the school is a continuation of the culture of the community and durability. It has to facilitate for the children of the community absorption and representation of the values of that society, trends, and standards of conduct in it. It trains them in methods of behavior acceptable to this community in attitudes and different social events (Othman, 1986, p. 78). This is a positive feature for the school and disadvantage at the same time. When the school works on integrating its generations in the context of specific values, these values may be positive and here appears the positive or negative feature of the school. This can be seen as a fault to school, where it often devotes values and concepts that stand in the way of development and advancement of the community.

The school is sometimes contrary to its role. The findings of a study of Menoufi, (1988, p. 130) has found that the school nourish a culture of obedience and submission. If a child is brought up to comply with all the symbols of power, he becomes then a meek man who hears and obeys without debate. He refuses the opposition and hates disobedience, and prefers submissiveness to rejection.

According to the opinion of Mkrom(1987,p. 216) it is essential for school that it has to play two roles at once, where its first role is to recognize the values of the students, while the second one is associated with the clarification of the nature of these values in its relations with the system of values and the other ethics. Then the completion of congenital job of the school is achieved. Nadia Abdel Moneim (1998, p.64) said that the school is a fortress in front of the pressures that objects the values of the individual and society, because the environment of the school must include a clear vision of the prevailing values inside, and society's values outside.

The student is affected by what happens inside the school of attitudes and events even though he refuses them all or some of them. Definitely, he is influenced positively or negatively. The school environment, including the promise of administrative regulations and different social relations have highly effect in the development of the values of citizenship among students. Then the real source of teaching the values is the prevailing culture in the school (Mkrom, 2005, p.109).

A study of (Bouhy, 1993,p.99) refers to the role of school management in providing environment and atmosphere school, which helps to acquire values and attitudes, through the relations prevailing between the members of the faculty, teaching methods correct that express sincere expression of appropriate behavior and values that are meant for generations follow suit, so the way the school administration, and the quality of activity, and the role of the teacher in the classroom is one of the best roads to strengthen and build values .

The countries that know the importance of the school and that it is a microcosm of society, allow students to exercise the values of citizenship in the school. All the schools in Japan, for example applied effectively system of students governments, composed of elected representatives and activities that promote and support school policies, and give students the freedom to plan on a large scale. Teachers supervise the meetings and activities and organization's leadership and representation of comrades, and collective decision-making process and holding responsibility. And that is the most important pillars and foundations of good citizenship values (Hatem, 1990, p. 199).

It should be noted that the school reaches its maximum effectiveness in the political socialization if there is a match between what you say and what you do. But when there is a contradiction between the content of the study materials and the behavior of the faculty members, it is inevitable of school humility in the field of political education e.g., the courses include values such as human dignity and equality among human beings, while involving the treatment of school for students on the violation of these values (Menoufi, 1987, p. 335).

Accordingly, raising the student on the values of patriotism and citizenship should be based on the actual roles carried out in the vicinity of the school for awareness and understanding and insight (Ismail et al, 1962,p. 30).

This is what Phoenix alerted (1982,p. 344) when he pointed out that the most effective formal education is celebration of social values in different ritual such as the festivals', inauguration concerts, and the representation of historical facts, and using symbols suitable as the flags , uniforms and job logos. Any learning or experience obtained by the student from the school cannot achieve its objectives unless there is interaction and cooperation and coordination between home, school, and community in order to strengthen and confirm the experience (Alhabeeb, 2005,p. 52).

This suggests that learners learn the types of values and behavior that symbolize the goals of education and imbued values and norms that govern various contexts of the school. They are in this education imitate consciously and unconsciously what is reinforced by daily interactions within the school through their different organizations, and inside the classroom through interactions that occur between the teacher and students and among the students. These implications rely on looking at the school as a cultural coordination. Educating the values is associated with the content of education on the one hand, and in a form that regulate the school environment on the other hand (Mkrom, 2005,p. 109).

The educational institutions as indicated by(Aevins, 2000,p. 161-162) when they stand in its dealings with students at verbal levels connected to home issues.

The researcher can sum up the influencing factors in the development of the values of citizenship within the school that are related to the indirect concept of education. and factors of the school environment vary, which play a major role in this area is various as the organizing school, the Constitution moral at the school, the impact of students to each other and educational activities outside curriculum, and the impact of visitors to the school, meetings of boards of parents and teachers, the type and nature of the social relationships between teachers themselves, and between teachers and students, the link of the school with the environment and its problems and concerns of the nation, ., and training of students to assume responsibilities. All of these affect in one way or another in the values of citizenship among students. The researcher finds that (teacher and syllabus) beside the factors he deals with in the mentioned above have an important influence. Thus, he specifies tow independent points as follow:

Fourth: Findings and Recommendations:

First: - Search results:

1 - The individual acquires national loyalty through his family first, then school, then from the whole society until the individual feels that he is a part of the whole.

2 - The family has a big role in raising children on patriotism and citizenship through several means. The most important of which are:

A-Promoting a culture of participation, dialogue, tolerance and coexistence with others.

B-Training children to perform their duties and uphold their rights.

C-Considering the public interest of the nation to individual interest.

3 – The school educates children patriotism and citizenship through: -

A-Promotion of belonging to the homeland, and being proud of history and achievements.

B-Teaching children two types of behavior (rights and duties).

C-To accustom children to coexistence and cooperation with local and international neighbors.

D-To create a school climate, curriculum, teacher, teaching methods, and school activities to improve the learning of patriotism and citizenship and their development in the hearts of children.

Second: - Recommendation:

1 –The family has to develop patriotism and citizenship in the hearts of her children through behaviors and practices that reflect the love of the homeland, and belonging to it.

2 - Work to spread the concepts of patriotism and citizenship and everything related to it , values, principles and skills in other courses.

3 – Teaching students patriotism and citizenship at certain or educational stage .But it has to continue teaching them and through the various educational ages.

4-School has to be a successful environment for the exercise of sound citizenship and the students practice to discuss that concern them and to take appropriate decisions and cure the differences of opinion between them and deal with violators.

5 - The family and the school have to instill patriotism and citizenship in the hearts of children by word and deed, and the national songs, and cultural competitions, fun games and national anthem, and everything that can achieve that noble goal.
